

Global Questions, Classroom Connections
2006 Summer Fair
August 14, 2006 from 9am-3pm
Castilleja School, Palo Alto

Inspired by the content, collaboration and professional connections generated in last summer's institute at Stanford University, the Bay Area Teacher Development Collaborative is pleased to sponsor a follow-up summer fair. This one-day session is designed to promote and share our best practices for bringing global education related programs and curriculum to independent schools in the Bay Area.

We will meet in small discussion groups, led by senior administrators and teachers from a diversity of disciplines and schools, to share our programs and experience. There will be many opportunities to delve into specific topics such as bringing the mission of global education to life in a school, pursuing travel study abroad, and incorporating global education into art, science, language and social studies courses.

This summer fair is geared specifically for middle and high school teachers in local independent schools. It will afford a special opportunity for participants to make connections with fellow educators and scholars, and to lay the groundwork for possible collaboration in the future.

- A round table discussion on Castilleja School's Global Week
- Workshops on how to bring global education to our classrooms:
- Curriculum ideas for the humanities, art, science and language
- Discussion on using technology to facilitate global education
- Workshops on how to incorporate global education to our students through programs outside of the traditional classroom:
- Combining service learning and global education
- Developing travel study programs for students and teachers
- Incorporating global education into our schools' mission.

Cost: $100
